Cloth diapers' benefits

For the two and half years of a single child, using cloth diapers represents approximately:

- 10 kg of cotton;
- 83 m³ of water for washing;
- 150 kg of organic waste, biodegradable within a few months and managed by the municipal water treatment plants instead of being dumped in landfills;
- a possibility to recycle (in worn textile plants);
- a total expenditure of about $700 to $1,000 including the washing and drying costs ($250 for a child aged 2 and a half years);
- no new expense for each newborn.

In addition:

- Your child's skin can breathe in watertight diapers (disposable sheets retain stools).
- Diapers are comfortable, with elastic bands to waist and thighs.

Disposable diapers' disadvantages

Using disposable diapers for a single child for two and a half years represents:

- 5 trees;
- 25 kg of plastic produced from 67 kg of crude oil;
- 120 m³ of water required to manufacture the diapers;
- 5,000 to 7,000 diapers thrown in the trash, taking between 300 and 500 years to decompose and representing an average weight of 800 to 1,000 g and 40% of the domestic waste from the child's home, excluding the pathogenic bacteria contained in the stool;
- a total expenditure of $2,000 for a single child;
- a repeated expenditure for every newborn in the family.

Did you know that...

In Quebec, we throw away 600 million disposable nappies a year, representing 60,000 tons of domestic waste yearly.

Disposable diapers are the third largest consumer item in landfills.

Nowadays cloth diapers are more modern and easier to clean

Nowadays, velcros and snaps have replaced pins and diapers are machine washable.

After a massive use of disposable diapers over the last forty years, people are slowly but surely rediscovering the benefits of cloth diapers.

In addition to the benefits associated with reducing the amount of garbage that ends up in landfills, these diapers are easy on natural resources, new parents' wallet and babies' delicate skin!
